

Union Station Gets New Look In $100,000 Face-Lifting Project

Denver's Union Station recently underwent a $100,000 face-lifting.

The staid old stone building at the foot of 17th st. has had its drab interior painted and its gift shop and soda fountain completely redecorated.

A $20,000 neon sign has been affixed to the front of the building. The sign, which can be seen from Broadway, has letters six feet high. The top line identifies the building as "Union station."

Underneath a second neon sign alternately blinks "Travel by Train" and "Ship by Train."

C. R. Hines, manager of the Denver Union Terminal Railway Co., said some of the interior had been painted about five years ago.

THE LOWER WALLS, however, have just been painted to harmonize with the ultra-modern gift shop and soda fountain.

Kenneth Fletcher, Denver manager for the Interstate Co. of Chicago, said it cost $80,000 to modernize the gift shop, news stand, fountain and Continental Dining Room and Coffee Shop.

The Chicago firm has a lease on all concessions in the Union Station.

A $20,000 neon sign which can be seen from Broadway has been installed on the front of Union Station. The six-foot letters of the sign identify the building. Underneath is another neon sign which alternately flashes "Ship by Train" and "Travel by Train."
